The spelling fluctuates between ay and aye: the former is preferable on grounds of etymology, phonology, and analogy. The word rimes, in the literary speech, and in all the dialects, with the group bay, day, gay, hay, may, way. aye, ay (aɪ), int. (adv.), sb. Forms: 6–8 I, 7 ai, 7–9 ey, 7– aye, ay. [Appears suddenly about 1575, and is exceedingly common about 1600; origin unknown. The suggestion that it is the same as AY adv. 'ever, always,' seems set aside by the fact that it was at first always written I, a spelling never found with AY. But it may have been a dialect form of that word, from some dialect in which it had passed through the senses of always, in all cases, to by all means, certainly, yes (cf. aye but, in sense 2 b; and the history of ALGATE), and so have been taken in literary English for a different word. It is less easy to see in it a phonetic variant or dialect form of ya 'yea, yes.' Spelt both aye and ay: the former is in accordance with parliamentary usage, and better on every ground. Aye and eye (which many identify in pronunciation, and which differ at most only in the 'broader' or more back sound of aye, are analogous diphthongal words usefully distinguished by their final e from the regular pronunciation of -ay, -ey, in bay, day, gay, hay, etc., and bey, dey, grey, they, convey, etc.: see AY.]

F. babuin (13th c.), mod. babouin, or ad. med.L. babewynus (used in England 1295, see Du Cange), found also in the forms babouinus, baboynus, babuynus (some, if not all, of which are merely latinized from F. or Eng.); = It. babbuino, Sp. babuino. French has also babion, treated by Littré as a distinct word, but in Eng. identified with baboon, and the source of LG. bavian, Du. baviaan, HG. pavian, baboon. The earlier history of the word is unknown.

Diez suggests connexion with F. babine the thick lip of a cow, dog, monkey, compared with dial. Ger. bäppe muzzle. Scheler, from its application also to children, refers it to same root as babe or It. babbolo, etc.; others compare med.L. papio (see PAPIOUN), a kind of wild dog mentioned by Jac. de Vitriaco, and Maundevile. Finally we may compare OF. babau, babou, baboue, babouye, baboy, a grimace, a 'mouth,' faire la baboue à, to make mouths at. According to Daunon (Hist. Lit. xvi. 39), in 13th c., med.L. babuinare meant 'to paint marginal figures in MSS.,' and F. babouin was equivalent to homuncio; in the earliest known F. quotation in Le Dit des xxiii manières de vilains (13th c.), li vilains babuins is a simpleton or ninny, who gapes at the statues in front of Notre Dame while his purse is cut from behind. The original meaning, and the order of the senses, thus remain quite uncertain.]

bachelor ('bætʃələ(r)). Forms: 3–6 bacheler, 3–7 -iler, 4–5 -ilere, -iller, -illier, bachler(e, -elere, 5– -ylere, baculere, 5–6 bachelar, 6 batchellour, -elar, bacchelaure, 6–7 batcheler, -ellor, -eller, batchler, 7 bachelaur, -elour, 7–8 batchelour, 8 bachellour, 5– bachelor. [a. OF. bacheler = Pr. bacalar, It. baccalare:—L. type baccalāris*, of doubtful origin. The later F. bachelier is corrupted in the termination, as is the 16th c. Eng. bachelour, bachelor: cf. ANCESTOR sb., and see -OR. The original meaning being uncertain, the sense-development is also doubtful.

Of med.L. baccalāris only a few late instances occur (in sense 1), which might be from the mod. langs. (see Du Cange, Bacularis). It was, however, prob. connected with baccalāria, a division of land, of which the size and nature varied at different times, and with the adjectives baccalarius, -aria, applied in 8th c. to rustics male and female who worked for the colonus or tenant of a mansus. (See Deloche, Cartulaire de Beaulieu Introd. éclairc. xxii.) But the precise relation of baccalāris* to these words, and its subsequent history are still uncertain. Still more doubtful is its derivation: baccalaria is with some probability referred to bacca, late L. and Romanic for vacca cow, through baccālis* (cf. ovīlis from ovis sheep), in which case it might be 'grazing farm,' and baccalarius one employed on it, the assistant of a colonus who had not a mansus of his own; Littré (without accounting for the sense) suggests Celtic bachall stick (a. L. baculus); the Welsh bach 'little' must be definitely discarded, its old Celtic form being bicc- or becc-, Irish becc. (Thurneysen.)] back- in comb. is used in many relations, substantive, adjective, and adverbial (rarely verbal), often difficult to separate, and in various senses. In some of these the combination is very loose, the use of the hyphen being almost optional.

This is especially the ease, when back is capable of being viewed as an adj., in which aspect the hyphen would not be used, e.g. back-yard or back yard, back-stroke or back stroke. As a rule, the use of the hyphen implies that the combination (in the case in point) has not the general and purely descriptive value of the two words, but is in some respect specialized or appropriated as a specific name.

bad (bæd), a. (and sb.) Also 4–6 badd(e. [ME. badde appears in end of 13th c., rare till end of 14th: see below. Regularly compared badder, baddest, from 14th to 18th c. (in De Foe 1721), though Shakspere has only the modern substitutes worse, worst, taken over from evil, ill, after bad came to be = evil.

Prof. Zupitza, with great probability, sees in bad-de (2 syll.) the ME. repr. of OE. bæddel 'homo utriusque generis, hermaphrodita,' doubtless like Gr. ἀνδρόγυνος, and the derivative bædling 'effeminate fellow, womanish man, μαλακός,' applied contemptuously; assuming a later adjectival use, as in yrming, wrecca, and loss of final l as in mycel, muche, lytel, lyte, wencel, wench(e. This perfectly suits the ME. form and sense, and accounts satisfactorily for the want of early written examples. And it is free from the many historical and phonetic difficulties of the derivation proposed by Sarrazin (Engl. Studien VI. 91, VIII. 66), who, comparing the etymology of madde, mad, earlier amad(de:—OE. ȝemæded (see AMAD), would refer badde to OE. ȝebæded, ȝebædd, 'forced, oppressed,' with a sense-development parallel to that of L. captīvus, 'taken by force, enslaved, captive,' It. cattivo, F. chetif, 'miserable, wretched, despicable, worthless.' No other suggestion yet offered is of any importance; the Celtic words sometimes compared are out of the question.]

badger ('bædʒə(r)), *sb.*¹ Forms: 5 bager, 7 (?) bodger, budger, 5– badger. [See BADGE *v.*², and note below.]

One who buys corn and other commodities and carries them elsewhere to sell; an itinerant dealer who acts as a middleman between producer (farmer, fisherman, etc.) and consumer; a cadger, hawker, or huckster. Still common in the dialects.

By Act 5 and 6 Edw. VI. c. 14 §7 Badgers were required to be licensed by the Justices (the origin of the hawker's license). Among the commodities in which they are said to have dealt are named corn (especially), fish, butter, and cheese. They were obnoxious to the charge of regrating, and hence the word is in some 17th c. vocabularies, e.g. Robertson's Phraseol. Gen. (196), explained as 'an ingrosser, a forebuyer, or forestaller of the market, one that buyeth corn and other provisions beforehand.'

[Also in the following Glossaries of E.D.S.: Swaledale (Meal-seller), Huddersf., Mid Yorksh., Cumbrld. (Flour or corn-dealer; also pedlar, huckster), Worcester, *N. [Note. Conjectures as to the derivation, and possible connexion with next word, depend greatly upon the original meaning. On the assumption that this was 'corn-merchant,' bager, badger, has been identified with obs. F. bladier, 'a Marchant or Ingrosser of corne,' Cotgr. (properly Provençal = OF. blaier, blayer); but this is phonetically inadmissible. If, however, we assume bager to represent a ME. blager*, with l unaccountably lost, this might represent an OF. blaagier*, f. blaage (bleage, bladage) harvest, corn-supply, feudal due paid in corn, f. ble, bled in med.L. bladum corn, wheat. (See H. Nicol Proc. Philol. Soc. 19 Dec. 1879.) But no such links between F. blaage and Eng. bager are found either in F. or Eng.; so that there is positively no evidence connecting badger with any deriv. of F. blé. And indeed a consideration of the whole (46) quotations which we have for the word leads to the conviction that the bager, badger, had no essential connexion with corn, any more than the lader, kidder, or carrier, named along with him in the statutes, proclamations and law-books. At present it is most in accordance with the facts to take badger as the agent-noun from BADGE v.].

badger ('bædʒə(r)), *sb.*² Also 6 bageard, 6–7 badgerd. [Only mod.Eng.: of doubtful origin. Prob. (as E. Müller suggests) from BADGE sb. + -ARD, in reference to the white mark borne like a badge on its forehead: cf. for the sense BAUSON and BALL *sb.*³, for the formation BALLARD.

Most etymologists have assumed the identity of this with the prec. word, citing the presumed analogy of the mod.F. name of the quadruped, blaireau, in 15th c. blereau, taken as a dim. of blaier, meaning 'little corn-merchant or corn-hoarder,' an appellation arising out of popular notions of the habits of the animal, 'which, it is said, makes away with much buck-wheat' (Littré). But this derivation seems to be erroneous. No OF. blaërel*, representing a L. blādārellus*, from blādārius, is found. And it seems certain that OF. blariau (12-13th c.), later blèreau, blaireau, in Flanders blairiau, blariau, in Normandy blierel, blérel, compared with OF blarie, blaire 'the bald-coot,' mod.F. dial. (Flanders, Picardy) blarie, blairie, (Normandy) blèrie, must be referred to MDu. and Flem. blaer 'bald,' MDu. blare, Flem. blaere, Du. blaar 'a white spot on the forehead of an animal.' Blaireau thus corresponds exactly to bauson, and its analogy strongly favours the derivation of badge-ard from badge.]

bail (beɪl), sb.[1] Also 5 bayll, baill, 5–7 bayle, 6–7 bayl, bale, baile. [In senses 1 and 2, a. OF. bail 'power, custody, jurisdiction,' and 'delivery,' n. of action f. baillier, in its senses of 'take charge of, guard, control,' and 'hand over, deliver' (see BAIL v.[1]). The remaining senses are peculiarly English, and their development not quite certain. But from the Latin phrase tradere in ballium alicui, found 1259, and the AF. lesser en bail (1331), it seems that bail was originally related to sense 1, and meant the 'custody or charge' (i.e. of the surety); cf. also the equivalent mainprise, manucaptio. But it must soon have been associated in meaning with sense 2, and the AF. bailler to deliver (chattels), since already in 16th c. it was explained as 'the delivery or handing over of the accused to his surety,' whence transferred to the security in consideration of which he was so delivered, and finally to the surety himself who became or gave security for his reappearance in court when called for judgement. There is nothing approaching these senses in Fr., while, on the other hand, the Fr. sense 'lease' is not in English.

Fr. bail, the n. of action, must be carefully distinguished from bail 'governor, ruler, tutor, guardian' (= Pr. baile, Sp. bayle, Pg. bailio, It. bailo, balio: —L. bājulus), never adopted in English (though sometimes erroneously stated to be the direct source of sense 6). Bail = bājulus was the primary word; thence the vb. bailler = bājulāre; thence again the n. of action bail formed in French, and adopted in English. (The word is discussed by COKE 4th. Inst. 178.)]

6. The person or persons who procure the release of a prisoner from the custody of the officer arresting him, or from prison, by becoming surety for his appearance in court for trial.

The bail now becomes answerable with his money, but formerly he might have to give his own person as security, whence the phrase to be or become bail, i.e. security, as opposed to give or put in bail of sense 5.

¶ In consequence of the transition of meaning in senses 3–6, many phrases are current which are not easily analysed. 'To say that the magistrate bails the prisoner (see BAIL v.[1] 2) is now somewhat old-fashioned. Generally, the magistrate accepts bail, admits to bail, allows bail, or (occasionally) holds to bail, or takes bail. I have also seen grants bail. The regular phrase of the Statute-book is, I think, "the magistrate may admit him to bail." In 45 Geo. III, c. 92, the magistrate also takes bail, the prisoner gives bail. Bail is also offered by the prisoner, and may be refused by the magistrate; on the day appointed his bail surrender, render, bring in, or produce him in court, or the accused surrenders to his bail. In the latter phrase, there is a notion of his delivering himself up in discharge of the recognizances into which he himself, as well as his sureties, has entered, for his appearance. This idea also colours the later use of hold to bail, admit to bail.' (F. W. Maitland.)

7. Comb. bail-bond, the bond or security entered into by a bail; bail-piece: (see quot.).

bail (beil), v.[1] Forms: 5–7 bayl(e, 6 bale, baal, 6–7 baile, 6– bail. [a. OF. baillier, bailier, bailler (= Pr. bailar):—L. bājulāre 'to bear a burden, to carry,' afterwards 'to carry on, manage, rule,' and 'to be guardian or tutor,' whence baillier ranged in OF. from 'bear, carry, handle, treat, manage, conduct, govern, control, rule, take charge of, guard,' to 'take hold of, receive, take, take away,' and 'hand over, deliver, give.' From the last of these arose the Anglo-French legal sense of 'deliver,' narrowed down in use to 'deliver on trust on certain conditions.' Sense 2 is probably immediately from BAIL sb.[1] 3, 4, as if short for 'let to bail, admit to bail,' but clearly influenced by AF. bailler in sense 1, so as to make ' deliver' or 'liberate' at length the leading idea. Hence extended from the act of the magistrate to that of the surety, and used in various transferred senses.]

[Common Teutonic: OE. bearn = OFris. bern, OS., OHG., MHG., Goth., ON., Da., Sw. barn, (MDu. baren):—OTeut. barno-(m)*, f. beran to bear. Lost in G. and Du.; also in southern Eng., where the modern repr. of OE. bearn would have been bern (cf. fern) or barn (cf. arm, warn). In fact, berne survived in the south to 1300, barn still survives in northern English, and was used by Shakspere; bairn is the Scotch form (cf. fairn, airm, wairn), occasionally used in literary English since 1700. It is doubtful whether the berne, bearn of some 17th c. Eng. writers was a survival of the early southern form, or a variant spelling of bairn. The pl. bærn in Ormin is the ON. börn, hence it is probable that the northern singular barn is as much of ON. as of OE. origin.]

[ME. balled, of uncertain origin; in sense 1, apparently a ppl. form from BALL v. or sb., with the sense of 'protuberant or rounded like a ball,' whence possibly 'smooth,' and, as applied to the head, 'hairless.' But the analogy of many words for 'bald' in various langs., in which the sense arises out of that of 'shining, white,' or esp. that of 'having a white patch on the forehead,' as in 'bald-faced stag,' 'bald-coot,' with the actual appearance of this sense in BALL *sb.*², strongly favours the idea that ME. ball-ed was a derivative of the latter (cf. also BALLARD), which is with evident propriety referred to Welsh bàl, as explained under sense 5. The chief difficulty is the rarity of the simple ball, and lack of early instances to prove its Eng. use before the appearance of ball-ed. For the termination, Sievers compares OE. -ede (OS. -odi) used esp. of bodily defects, as in heal-ede ruptured, hofer-ede hunchbacked, etc.

Cf. the analogy of MDu. blaer 'bald' and blare, Du. blaar 'white patch on the forehead' of a horse, etc.; also of MHG. blas 'bald,' earlier 'shining,' and blasse 'white patch on the forehead'; also of Du. bles 'bald' and blesse; and see blas in Grimm; also Wedgwood and Skeat. Cf. also Gr. φαλακρός 'bald,' lit. 'white- or shining-pated.' There seems little ground for the suggestion of Kluge that balled represents a lost OE. bællod* = bærlod*, Goth. bazlops*, from OTeut. baz-oz BARE.]

[From the evidence at present, the inference is that the current sense was transferred from 1 or 2, either with the notion of 'frothy talk,' or of 'a senseless farrago' or 'jumble of words.' Most etymologists have however assumed 3 to be the original sense, and sought its explanation in the obvious similarity of balder to dial. balder 'to use coarse language,' Du. balderen 'to roar, thunder,' Norwegian baldra, Icel. baldrast, ballrast 'to make a clatter,' and of -dash to the vb. dash in various senses. The Welsh baldorddus adj., f. baldordd 'idle noisy talk, chatter,' has also been adduced. Malone conjectured a reference to 'the froth and foam made by barbers in dashing their balls backward and forward in hot water.' Other conjectures may be found in Wedgwood, Skeat, and E. Müller. ballast ('bæləst), sb. Forms: 6-8 balast, 6–7 ballace, 6 ballass, -esse, balest, -ist, 7 balasse, -ase, ballasse, -ais, 7 ballast. [Now found in most of the European langs.; Sw. Da., Fris., Du., LG. (whence Ger., Russ., Fr.) ballast. Origin doubtful: the oldest form is possibly OSw. and ODa. barlast (before 1400, and regularly in 15th c.), f. bar bare + last load, with the sense of 'bare, naked, or mere load or weight,' i.e. lading which is mere load, lading for the sake of weight merely. Thence ballast, with ll for rl by assimilation, already in 15th c. Sw. and Da., whence in Eng. soon after 1500. The later Da. bag-last 'back-load,' Du. . (17th c.) balg-last 'belly-load,' were corrupted by 'popular etymology.' The final t was lost in Flem. ballas, and the 16–17th c. Eng. ballace, -as (first in the vb, where ballast was plausibly analysed as ballass-ed.) Contact of sense further often confused ballace and BALLANCE.

(The form ballast also occurs before 1400 in LG., and is taken as the original by Schiller and Lübben, who explain it from bal bad (= BALE a.) as bad lading 'schlechte Schiffsfracht, die man nur ladet um dem Schiffe den nöthigen Tiefgang zu geben.' If this is well founded, barlast would rank with bag-, balg-last, as a popular perversion.)]

Teut. (OHG., MHG., OS., OFris., MDu.) bann, ban, sb. 'proclamation commanding or forbidding under threat or penalty,' f. bann-an to BAN. The simple sb. bann does not appear in OE., which had however ȝebann, rare ME. iban 'proclamation, edict, f. the deriv. ȝebannan. The ON. bann 'excommunication, interdict, prohibition, curse,' seems too late to have been the source of the Eng. But, as OE. had the vb. bannan, ban from OF. easily assumed the position of its vbl. sb., and the two words, with the med.L. bannum, -us, in its various legal and ecclesiastical uses, subseq. re-acted upon each other, so that the development of sense is complicated.]

band (bænd), sb.[3] Also 5–6 bande. [Late 15th c. bande, a. F. bande = Pr., Sp., It. banda, app. adopted from Teutonic (cf. OHG. bant, OS., ON. band: see BAND sb.[1]; also Goth. bandi: see BEND sb.[1]). The word received in Romanic a new development of sense, not found in Teutonic, with which it has since been taken back, not only into Eng., but also into Ger. (bande) and Du. (bende, formerly bande); the adoption being facilitated by its obvious connexion with the native words. In Eng., where the pre-existing BAND sb.[1], was synonymous with bend, the present word was, by confusion with these, also often written bend. So also in mod.Du. bende for bande, by assoc. with a native bende: see BEND sb.[1]

The actual history of banda in this sense, and its relation to the Teutonic forms, are not without uncertainty, owing to our ignorance at present of its age, and to the fact that It., Sp., Pg. banda, F. bande, are found also as synonyms of benda, bende 'fascia' (which, except in It., they have now indeed superseded), while conversely Littré's earliest example of bande 'troop' is spelt bende, thus showing at least form-association between the two words. And some actually identify them: Du Cange says that the company of soldiers formed by Alfonso of Castille was called a banda, from the red banda or ribbon worn by them as a sash; and the new ed. of the Vocab. della Crusca explains banda as 'Company of soldiers, because originally distinguished by a banda or band of cloth of a certain colour.' But Littré refers banda, bande 'troop' to late L. bandum BANNER; and Du Cange shows med.L. bandus in sense both of 'fascia,' and of 'company of men collected under a certain leader or banner,' thus associating all three notions. Whatever the original source, it is evident that the popular feeling associated benda, banda, 'fascia, stripe, sash, scarf, ribbon,' banda, 'company, troop,' and bandum 'banner.']

Teut. bann: see BAN *sb.*¹ There was a confusion in Romanic between bannum and bandum: Du Cange shows bannum for bandum, BANNER, as well as bandum for bannum 'edict'; cf. BANISH, BANDIT, BANNER, BANDEROLE. (There is no etymological connexion in Teutonic between bann, bann-an, and bandwa token, bandwjan to signify.)]

Jurisdiction, authority, dominion, control; power of disposal, full discretion, or authority to deal with. to be in or at any one's bandon: to be under his control, at his disposal, will, or pleasure. To have a thing in one's bandon: at one's full or free disposal.

bank (bæŋk), sb.[3] Forms: 5–7 banke, 6 bancke, 7 banque, banck, 7– bank. [Early mod.E. banke, a. F. banque, ad. It. banca fem., used side by side, and in same sense, with banco masc.; ad. Teut. bank, banc, bench: see prec. word. The double form and gender in Romanic, cf. It., Sp., Pg. banco, banca, Pr. banc, banca, F. banc, banche, are apparently original (see med.L. bancus, banca, in Du Cange), and due to the double gender of the German: OHG. der, diu banch, MHG. der, die banc, early mod. and dial. G. der, die bank. The original meaning 'shelf, bench' (see BANK[1] and [2], and BENCH) was extended in It. to that of 'tradesman's stall, counter, money-changer's table, mensa argentaria, τράπεζα,' whence 'money-shop, bank,' a use of the word which passed, with the trade of banking, from Italy into other countries. In this sense, It. uses both banco and banca, Sp. and Pg. the masc. banco; but in F. the It. fem. banca was adapted as banque, whence Eng. banke, bank. The word is thus ultimately identical with BENCH and BANK[2], and cognate with BANK[1].

(Although, in It., monte 'mount, heap, amount, stock,' was used in some of the senses of 'bank,' the notion that the name banco, banca, originated in a German rendering of monte is erroneous: G. bank had no such sense as 'mount, heap,' only that of 'bench, shelf.' Rather is it the fact, that in the development of banking, the banco of the money-changer, and the monte or 'joint-stock capital' were at length combined, and bank applied in Eng. to both.)]

2. A merchant, trader, or other person, whose property and effects, on his becoming insolvent, are administered and distributed for the benefit of all his creditors, under that system of statutory regulations called the Bankrupt or Bankruptcy Laws. As these laws (which began in England with Acts 34 and 35 Henry VIII, c. 4) were originally directed against fraudulent traders, who absconded with the property of their creditors, or eluded the attempts of creditors to get at them, the earlier senses were:

†a. in Law. 'A trader who secretes himself, or does certain other acts tending to defraud his creditors.' Blackstone.

†b. popularly. One who has brought himself into debt by reckless expenditure or riotous living; a fugitive from his creditors, a broken man in sanctuary or outlawry. (In these senses the bankrupt was a criminal.)

d. in Mod. Law. Any trader or other person insolvent, who, on the petition of a creditor or creditors, or on his own petition, to the Bankruptcy Court, is declared or adjudged bankrupt, and his estates administered as stated above.

Formerly only a trader could be made a bankrupt; other persons became insolvent; in U.S. the legal distinction between the two was abolished in 1841, and in England in 1869; it had long before disappeared in popular use.

1. a. prop. A piece of stout taffeta, or other cloth, attached by one side to the upper part of a long pole or staff, and used as the standard of an emperor, king, lord, or knight, under (or after) which he and his men marched to war, and which served as their rallying-point in battle; hence, that of a country, nation, army, or company. Phrases: to join the banner of, follow the banner of. In the literal sense, now chiefly historical; in poetry and elevated prose, applied to the standard or flag of a country; common in figurative expressions.

Heraldically, a banner means a square or quadrangular flag, displaying the arms of the person in whose honour it is borne, and varying in size from that of an emperor, six feet square, to that of a knight banneret, three feet square. In this sense we still commonly speak of the banners of the Knights of the Garter, in St. George's Chapel, Windsor.

1. a. Originally, a knight able and entitled to bring a company of vassals into the field under his own banner, and who ranked next to a baron and above other knights: in this sense commonly used substantively, as a title of rank or dignity, and contrasted with knight, though sometimes with bachelor. b. Subsequently, the title and rank were conferred for valiant deeds done in the king's presence on the field of battle (perhaps, also, on other occasions or for other grounds), and, with the decay of the feudal system, came to constitute merely a rank or order of knighthood: in this use occur both banneret and knight-banneret, the latter opposed to knight-bachelor. On the institution of the order of baronets in 1611, precedence was given to these over all bannerets 'except such as were made in the field, under the banner, the king being present,' and after this the order of knights-bannerets was allowed to die out.

Note. The original sense was mainly French; 'in England there were few tenants bringing any considerable number of men who were not of the rank of the barons' (Penny Cycl.); the first recorded instance of use b. is in the 15th year of Edward III, when John de Copeland was made a banneret for his capture of King David Bruce at Neville's Cross. In the claim of Baronets to precedency (in 1612) it is said 'there are not Bannerets now in being and peradventure never shall be'; and although the title has been claimed for certain persons knighted since that day, heraldic authorities do not admit the validity of the claim. See the matter discussed in Nicolas' Hist. Knighthood (1842) I. pp. xxxii-xliii. In later times an explanation of the name was sought either in its being conferred on the field 'under the banner,' or in the alleged fact that at its bestowal the knight's pennon was symbolically cut square to banner shape.

bar (bɑ:(r)), sb.[6] [f. Gr. βάρος weight; cf. ISOBAR.]

1. A unit of pressure equivalent to one dyne per square centimetre.

1903 RICHARDS & STULL New Method determining Compressibility 43 Might not the pressure of a dyne per square centimeter be suitably called a bar?

2. A unit of barometric pressure equivalent to a pressure of 29·53 inches or 750·1 mm. of mercury at 0° C. in latitude 45°. (See also quot. 1918.)

1910 V. BJERKNES et al. Dynamic Meteorol. & Hydrography I. i. 7 It will be necessary for us to have names for the employed units of pressure..some name derived from the word 'barometer'. We shall choose the name bar as being the shortest, and designate the decimal parts of it as the decibar, centibar, and millibar. Ibid., We find that 1 meter of mercury at 0° C. at a place where gravity has this standard value exerts the pressure of 1·333193 bars. 1914 Q. Jrnl. R. Meteorol. Soc. Apr. 160, I [sc. Bjerknes] therefore coined the terms 'bar', 'decibar', 'centibar', and 'millibar', as names for the units of pressure... I employed these expressions for the first time in a paper published in 1906 [in Beiträge zur Physik der freien Atmosphäre, Strassburg]. 1917 A. MCADIE in Ann. Astron. Observ. Harvard LXXXIII. 47 The term millibar was unfortunately used by Bjerknes in his 'Dynamic Meteorology and Hydrography'. He defined the bar as a megadyne atmosphere, seemingly unaware of a prior use of the word by Richards and others in its proper sense. 1918 Meteorol. Gloss. 43 Bar..was introduced into practical meteorology by V. Bjerknes, and objection has been raised by McAdie..on the ground that the name had been previously appropriated by chemists to the C.G.S. unit of pressure, the dyne per square centimetre. The meteorological bar is thus one million chemical bars, and what chemists call a bar we should call a microbar.

bargander, obs. form of BERGANDER.

bargaret, variant of BARGERET.

barge (bɑːdʒ), sb.[1] Forms: 4- barge, 4-7 berge, (7 barg). [a. OF. barge (= Pr. barga, c 1180, med.L. barga), of which the L. type might be either barga or bārica*. Diez favours the latter, taking it as a possible derivative of L. bāris, Gr. βᾶρις, a kind of boat used on the Nile, an Egyptian word (Coptic barí a little pleasure-boat); but there is no evidence that this word was ever used in the West. As to barga see BARK sb.[2]

If barge was, as seems certain, the same as barca, BARK sb.[2], it was originally a ship's boat, used as a lighter, etc.; in OF., 13th c., we still find 'la barge de la nef' (Littré): cf. senses 2-4. But, as with barca, the name was extended to a boat or small ship with sails; and this was the first use in English: see sense 1. After the introduction (by Caxton) of barque, barke from 15th c. Fr., that word took the place of barge, which, after 1600, is found in the sense of 'ship' only in translators or historians. The modern senses revert more nearly to that of the original barca.]
